Education Advisory Committee - Questions*

There are numerous and increasingly complex challenges within the education system that have led me to question the long-term stability of the teaching profession. At times, I find myself wondering whether my role as an educator will remain relevant in the next decade. While much of the public discourse centers on whether artificial intelligence will replace teachers, I believe the more pressing concern lies elsewhere.

The true challenge, in my experience as a public school teacher, is the growing lack of student motivation. This issue, more than technological advancement, poses a significant threat to meaningful learning and to the future of education itself. Without student engagement, even the most innovative tools and methodologies—whether driven by AI or not—struggle to achieve their intended impact.

At the same time, I strongly believe that there are many opportunities to strengthen and modernize our educational system. With thoughtful reform, schools can become more responsive, dynamic, and competitive within the context of an increasingly AI-driven world. By fostering curiosity, relevance, and a stronger sense of purpose in students, we can better prepare them not only to coexist with emerging technologies, but to thrive alongside them. My vision for the future of education includes a stronger emphasis on vocational pathways and a reduced reliance on standardized approaches. While academic rigor remains essential, the current system would benefit from offering more diverse and practical avenues that reflect the realities of today's workforce.

I believe that students should graduate not only with theoretical knowledge, but with tangible skills that allow them to transition confidently into the real world. Expanding vocational programs, certifications, and hands-on learning experiences would provide students with meaningful opportunities to explore career paths aligned with their interests and strengths.
